A set of software tools allowing for quick and easy analysis of protein sequence data is presented. Based on the relevant features of the generic all-against-all BLAST program, a pipeline is provided as a web service that can be used as a template to further develop similar tools for other protein sequence data. The pipeline is easily implemented in Python and user-friendly interfaces are provided. In addition to routine sequence analysis, the pipeline provides access to a set of pre-calculated tables, such as the all-against-all conserved domain occurrence database in the Protein Data Bank, the set of conserved domain compositions of proteins in the Swiss-Prot database, as well as annotated profiles of selected features in the Swiss-Prot database, such as phylogenetic properties, cellular location, and protein family description. Ferroelectricity in semiconductors: ferroelectricity in semiconductors is observed in semiconductor materials with a perovskite-type structure. The properties of a semiconductor, such as its electrical conductivity, are strongly dependent on the ionic arrangement of the structure. Changes in
